

This paper examines local governance and community power in Korea. It clarifies the following characteristics of local governance: the local government has remained functionally and financially limited despite its constitutional autonomy; the structure of local governance turns out to be largely fragmented and dispersed; local decisions are subject to tight central control; local electoral ...

In their continued considerations of political inequality, urban scholars are especially concerned with less visible influences surrounding community decision making, and have employed such concepts as potential power, nondecision making, and anticipated reactions. However, these concepts leave some patterns of influence unexplained.

Although concerned most directly with local politics, community power is linked to issues about the basic nature of democracy in modern society. The work that drew attention to power was Floyd Hunter 's 1953 book on Atlanta, Community Power Structure: A Study of Decision Makers. Earlier community studies dealt with power only incidentally.

The role of collective and individual actors in local politics has traditionally been analysed by pluralist or power approaches, which look at the interaction between various public and private ...

He concludes that interest group pluralism combined with a concentration of institutional power in the hands of the city mayor and state governor combines a "social choice mechanism" and central decision-making in a mixed decision choice system approximating the logically preferable outcome. 16 More recently, Niklaus Luhmann has restated ...

In 1989, the City of Virginia Beach sought to discourage thousands of young African-American college students from holding their annual festival in the city. The policy failed and a major civil disorder occurred. This study explores the city's decision-making process on this issue. The alternative explanations provided by elite, pluralism, and systemic power theories are ...

The nondecision process can best be studied by viewing power as having a strategic dimension and as operating at three levels. A nonpluralist approach treats the public and private sectors as highly interdependent and assumes that a wide range of social resources and community activities are politically relevant, though not always manifestly so. Given that social resources ...

A regime thus does not represent a form of domination, "power over", as ordinarily understood, so much as one form of empowerment, "power to," crowding out others. (Stone, 2005b, p. 6.) Stone thinks his emphasis on "power to" also is useful for thinking about political change: "Power to" also has implications for strategies of political change.

Urban regime theory derives from political scientist Clarence Stone's (1989, 2005) empirical studies of Atlanta, Georgia. Like growth coalition theory it was influenced by the community power debate, but the two theories" different disciplinary origins in urban sociology and political science account for their contrast.
